Very beautiful worldQ: Why is Cu in alloys so widely accepted as essential Since the early nineties, the use of Cu (and other metal) in alloys to improve the strength has been accepted as necessary. With increasing pressure to reduce the environmental impacts of producing a lot of metal, this seems expensive. When one hits the nerve system in the hand via the conduit axon of a muscle, increasing the diameter from a microthin to a micron thick nerve is a design choice that seems to be supported by a lot of reasoning, at the cost of every other mechanical property, such as flexibility and breaking force. All my experiences with metals over the years support an understanding that the moment you start loading the material without great care and attention to design considerations, the material starts to fail. Why is the very understanding of metals that "soft but tough" and "ductile but brittle" is deemed a failure of expectations? A: I really don't know the answer to your question, but I just want to underline that the ECU(Extra Counter Urete) of a bike is made of a material which is quite different than a scale bar. I think it is really the work of alloy designer to find a compromise between the toughness and the weight...because weight is quite expensive. A: What is often overlooked is that copper is a poor conductor of heat, and poorly conducts, conducts a lot of heat. Thus, a copper based alloys is generally much better thermally than many other materials. It also means it will have far less warping, if you want to check on it's flexibility. It also means it will not overheat, so that makes it safer for use in more aggressive environments. If you have ever tried to bend a copper bar with force, you will know it becomes brittle, and will bend with a high strength straight

Description of the Related Art Conventionally, the joystick used for various types of video games and the like has a control lever which is selectively moved in the direction of an X axis and a Y axis. The control lever moves on a plane perpendicular to a front/rear direction. The control lever is manually moved while being fitted to a stationary control unit. The control lever is provided so as to be capable of being moved relative to the control unit. The control lever is, in general, constituted by a base plate having a circular shape, to which a respective end portion is fixed. The base plate is fitted to an annular plate, which is provided in the vicinity of the control unit. The annular plate is, in turn, fitted to the control unit, such that the annular plate is sandwiched between the base plate and a cap plate, the direction of which is orthogonal to that of the base plate. The respective ends of the base plate are fitted to annular plate, which is, in turn, fitted to a stationary plate. The stationary plate is fixed to the control unit. The respective ends of the stationary plate are fitted to an inner circumferential wall of a slide frame, which is provided to a movement frame. The movement frame is retained by a housing, which is fixed to the
