Optimization of conditions of cathodic protection in soils with various degrees of acidity, Al content and co-existence of Fe and Ca. In this research, in order to investigate the occurrence of microbial Al precipitation and the role of pH, Al and Fe concentrations, it is studied the cathodic protection of soils under laboratory conditions. The results show that the microbial precipitation of Al could be optimized, depending on the soil type in an acidic environment. The initial pH value is a determinant of the regulation of microbial electrochemical oxidation, a cathodic process occurring during the cathodic protection of soil, and this process is strongly influenced by the Ca concentration. The presence of Fe and Al in the soil, even in co-existence, promotes microbial precipitation of Al. In order to optimize Al precipitation and to avoid corrosion, it is necessary to determine the pH value and the initial Al and Fe concentrations in the soil. Cathodic protection is an economical and ecological technique that may be widely used to prevent the corrosion of soil and the associated problems.
