Why would you use F# 3.0 static methods instead of the normal F# methods? Has this got anything to do with the extension (x) method? A: Regarding static methods, F# 3.0 calls them (static) and derives from them (statics). See here. Regarding extension methods, I've never understood the choice for static methods. There are two main types of extension methods: 1) Extension method that will be shared by every type of object (called 'normal extension methods'). 2) Extension method that will only be defined once (called'static extension methods'). It seems to me that for extension methods (2) the normal call of the method is the right way to go. There is no reason to look at the type, but to call the method on the static type. A: I think the best explanation is given on MSDN: In F# 3.0, user-defined extension methods are called as static methods. This decision was made because extension methods are often used to provide a defined programming interface. Since they are implemented by static methods, extension methods are not quite instance methods, and lack such key features as a context, this parameter, and the ability to be chained. It is still possible to provide polymorphism in your extension method, but this is done in a different way than with instance methods. So for "normal" extension methods, method signature will be: public static to(this IN self, IN k) where OUT : IEnumerable whereas for "static extension methods" will be (more or less): public static to(this OUT self,...) where OUT : IEnumerable A: I have a crude analogy: F# is similar to OCaml with its typing and generics the extension methods are similar to the object.field Are the static methods a la F# too similar to the static methods of C#?
