"Rewriting" an (oriented) surface Let us first state a classical theorem. It can be found in Topology from an Advanced Geometric Viewpoint by R.M.Smale Lemma Let S be an oriented surface. Then we can find an oriented surface N , such that: There is an orientation preserving homeomorphism between S and N , There is an orientation preserving diffeomorphism between S and N . In fact, we can assume that N is a cube and it suffices to find, for each face, an orientation preserving homeomorphism to cover the corresponding face of S . Problem Let us continue. Let S be a closed connected oriented surface. Fix an orientation on S . Question Is it possible to "rewrite" S (without changing its orientation) so that it becomes equal to a plane in its re-written version? Basically, I want to find a sequence of homeomorphisms that shrink the surface S while preserving the orientation. I also want the homeomorphisms to "really" shrink the surface, so I need continuity. P.S. I apologize for this "general" question. If it seems it is too general, then I will add more details in my comment at your answer. A: Another possible answer is through the use of self-indexing triangulations. A self-indexing triangulation of a closed 2-manifold is basically just a collection of smaller versions of the surface. As such, you can 'swap out' a triangle for a square to basically get a rectangle that's already a plane. However, a self-indexing triangulation of an open surface must be a regular one, which is also a plane. A regular self-indexing triangulation of a surface is a subdivision of the surface into triangles, and is called a mesh. and even a barbed wire fence.
